PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

CONNECTING RAILROAD BRIDGE, F. & MOUNT PARK, PHILADELPHIA.

TO SUMMER TOURISTS.

WHERE TO GO, AND WHAT TO SEE.

THE season for recreation and health-seeking having come with the lengthened days of June, thousands of the dwellers in cities are beginning to consider the question where they can spend the time allotted them for these purposes to the best advantage. The Pennsylvania Railroad presents to them its Annual Excursion Book, and accompanies it with some facts which may assist in a judicious decision. Penetrating, as this road does, every portion of the country,—extending through all the varied scenery for which the Eastern, Middle, and Northern States of the Union are celebrated,—and furnishing accommodations over and along its various lines equal to any in the world, the taste must be fastidious indeed which it cannot please, and the requirement exacting to the last degree which it cannot satisfactorily fill.

Leaving Philadelphia by its main line, the traveler passes for a hundred miles through a region which a distinguished Southern Senator, years ago, pronounced the most perfectly cultivated agricultural country in America. Suddenly, then, he bursts into the Valley of the Susquehanna, along the banks of which he is carried for many miles, crossing it at one place on a magnificent bridge, in the midst of a view that, for grandeur and beauty, cannot be surpassed.

The scenery of the Susquehanna is as peculiar as it is picturesque. The river is about a mile in width, and its crystal waters roll through numerous gorges cut in the outlying mountains of the Allegheny range. Numerous islands dot its surface, some of them being so densely covered with trees as to leave nothing visible but a mass of foliage resting on its shimmering bosom. At Northumberland it divides into the North and West Branches, the first-named flowing through the great Anthracite coal-field and the famous Valley of Wyoming; while the last forces its way from the water-shed forming the southern boundary of Lake Erie, and is followed for many miles by the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad.

Bending to the west at Duncan's Island—a place noted in Indian and early American history—he follows the “blue Juniata” through its mountain passes and placid valleys, until the great Allegheny is reached. Carried over this by engineering skill, with an ease that cannot fail to interest and surprise him, he joins the Conemaugh, in the midst of its coal-mines and iron manufactories, and journeys along its banks amid scenes which poets have sung and artists painted, but about which he can say, after gazing upon them, in the words of the Queen of Sheba, that the “half has not been told.” Leaving the mountains again, he is whirled by rich farms, and richer coal-mines—whose products give light to all the eastern cities, until the Monongahela is seen, at the spot where Washington received his “baptism of fire,” and, by saving Braddock's panic-stricking army, gave the world an evidence of that genius which subsequently made him the father of our country. A little further and Pittsburg is reached—that great centre of American iron industry from which railroads ramify to every portion of the West and South, terminating only on the tropical shores of the Gulf of Mexico, or the golden sands of the Pacific.

In making this journey through Pennsylvania, the excursionist will find many places to pause at, and things to remember with pleasure and profit. The road itself is the most perfectly constructed in America. Double-tracked throughout with steel rails, its improved and palatial cars move at the maximum of railroad speed, without jar or noise, and no dust arises from the stone-ballasted track to mar the pleasure of the ride. At Lewistown, Altoona, Latrobe, and other stations of interest, the Company own splendid hotels which are kept in the best manner. Polite and intelligent employees will always be found willing to give him any information he may require, and his comfort and safety will be secured by the utmost care and attention.

If his eyes are turned northward for the summer jaunt, he will, when at Harrisburg, continue on up the Susquehanna river, until the borders of New York are reached; then, following the railroads which connect with the Pennsylvania, he will reach Watkins' Glen—that secluded mystery of beauties, which the elements have been for ages carving and decorating. From there he will be carried to Seneca Lake, over which steamboats convey him, showing glimpses here and there of those wonderful shores that science never grows weary of studying or taste of admiring. At Geneva, the cars will be ready to bear him to the Clifton Springs; and from that resting-place he will find it but a brief journey until he stands awed by the stupendousness of the world's wonder — NIAGARA FALLS!

Taking the cars of the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad, he will follow, for miles, the West Branch of the Susquehanna river, past cities and towns which the great lumber interest has built along its banks; and at RENOVÉ he can enjoy scenery as beautiful, air and water as pure, and hotel accommodations as elegant, as can be desired. Resuming his progress, he will journey through the wonderful forests that for years have been sending their wealth down the swollen streams to supply the wants of eastern consumers. He will see flourishing manufactories springing up amid the wilderness, and beautiful towns presenting all the attractions of taste and elegance. By a slight detour southward, he can reach the oil regions, where fabulous sums have been lost and made; and a little further on he will arrive at the beautiful city of Erie, on the great lake of that name, from which steamers run to the many interesting points in the North-west.

Taking Philadelphia again as a starting point, he can, in a few hours, reach Cape May or Long Branch—those famed sea-side resorts, where the ceaseless waves murmur their melody to hundreds of thousands of health and pleasure seekers. Or, by way of the Belvidere Delaware Railroad, he can travel for a hundred miles along the shores of the Delaware river, amid scenery which, for mellowness of outline, gorgeousness of forest color, and depth of light and shadow, cannot be surpassed, until he reaches the “Water Gap,” whose beauties “a thousand pens have sought to trace, but all have failed to tell.” Here everything is prepared for his comfortable sojourn, and he can linger many days, finding new beauties and discovering novel delights.

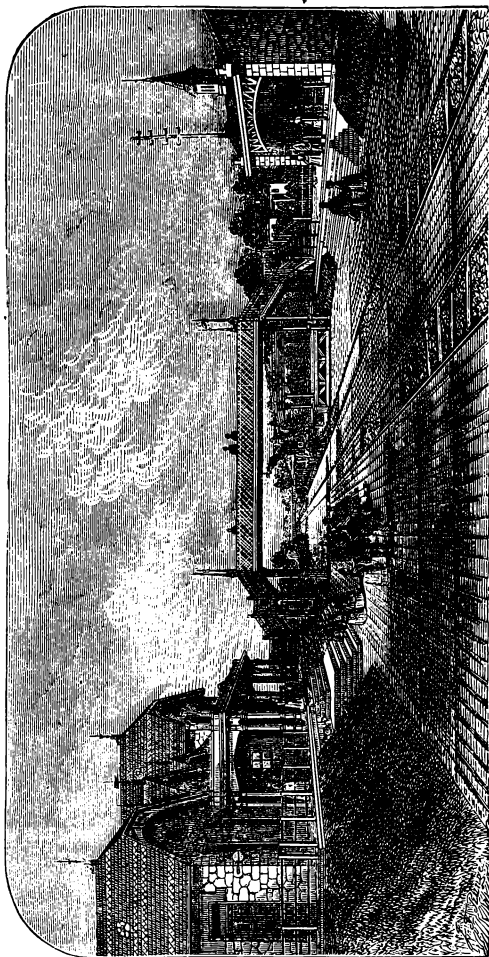

Away up among the mountains—hidden like a gem in its casket—he will find the “Bedford Springs,” the waters of which are celebrated everywhere for their medicinal qualities. These springs have been, for many years, the Mecca of American politicians, and their walks have echoed to the tread of many of the greatest statesmen the nation has produced, who came here annually, as one of them expressed it, “for a new lease of life.” Still higher up, perched on the top of the Alleghenies, two thousand feet above the sea, he can stop at Cresson, where the purity of the air will remind him of Ponce de Leon’s “Fountain of Youth;” while the elegance of the accommodations at his command—the shaded rambles amid trained shrubbery—the murmuring pines, with their soft carpet of faded leaves—the gigantic rhododendrons lighting up the woods with their splendors—will tempt him to linger and enjoy.

“Minnequa,” looming into fame in the northern part of the State, invites him to its secluded, primeval forests, where trout dance in every stream. And last, but by no means least in interest, Gettysburg,—that hallowed ground, where the hosts of the North and South met in desperate combat which continued three days, deluging the earth in blood and strewing it thick with graves—where the mementoes of victory have been reared by the gratitude of a nation saved, and where monuments of mourning mark the resting places of many loved and lost,—offers him a welcome and proffers him her healing waters, along with her history of thrilling interest, which will be listened to by Americans in ages to come as the Greeks listened to the story of Marathon.

Independent of the attractions offered in Pennsylvania and its vicinity, the routes enumerated in this book take in every place of interest in the United States. The northern lakes—the picturesque St. Lawrence—the Green Mountains of Vermont—the White Mountains of New Hampshire—the historic coasts of New England—the attractions of Newport and Saratoga—the famed Hudson, are all included; and an examination of its pages cannot fail to secure a satisfactory solution of the tourist’s problem: “Where to go, and what to see.”
